“ Growing up with my grandfather was an enjoyment. He always found ways to make me smile, laugh, and have fun. He would always play this game where he would stare at me until I smiled; but, of course, I'd always lose and he laughed the minute I crack. Another enjoyment were skipping races from the car to the store. He'd just laugh away and tell the on-goers I was his grand daughter. When we returned or I would the car, he'd reach his hand behind and squeeze mine saying “love you doll, ok?” as he held a bright smile through the rear view mirror. Through driving, he'd reach back and write “I love you” with his finger tracing on my hand. Sometimes, it would even be my back when I hugged him. He taught me a lot of positive and great mind sets in this life. I'll never forget him nor the great things he has done for my family and I. He's in heaven now and I thank God everyday that I had the pleasure to be his grand daughter. One day, I'll see him again, but until that moment I hold him in my heart. He will always be the apple of my eye and the glow in my heart. I love you Barry Whittemore Haigh, rest peacefully.

“ I will never forget the day we brought Dakota home from the hospital. Barry was so excited that he got Dakota from the vehicle and as he was walking toward the house tripped over a tree stump. Dakota went flying up in the air and like a balarenia Barry spun back around and caught Dakota before he hit the ground.
